A work of literature can be thought of as involving four different and potentially quite separate time frames: author time (when the work was originally written or published); narrator time (when the narrator in a work of fiction supposedly narrates the story); plot time (when the action depicted actually takes place); and reader or audience time (when a reader reads the work or sees it performed).

Time in Literature - Exactly What Is Time?

According to Bakhtin (1981c: 250), chronotopes, 'functioning as the primary means for materializing time in space,' emerge as the 'organizing centers for the fundamental narrative events of the novel'--as centers for 'concretizing representation,' as the place where 'the knots of narrative are tied and untied.'

Space, Time and Narrative: Bakhtin and Ricoeur

Narratives occur in a space and unfold in time. In narrative art, the artist chooses how to portray the story, represent the space, and how to shape time within the artwork. Narrative art can be categorized into various types, also known as modes or styles. A piece of artwork is not limited to only one type of narrative. An artwork may have a narrative type as a whole, as well as portions of the artwork itself that depict separate types of narratives.

"A brilliant contribution to this somewhat cacophonous conversation about time and 'temporality'. . . . Clearly written, philosophically subtle, and metaphorically rich, Narrative and Freedom will become a necessary book for literary scholars anxious to sort out the meaning of time in narrative structures. In an age of entertainment, when a cornucopia of narratives lure people in a thousand ...
